Willa Cather wrote about the places she knew, including Nebraska, New Mexico, New York, and Virginia. Often forgotten among these essential locations has been people and formed friendships both ephemeral and lasting. She published extensively—ranging from profiles and reviews but also celebrating poetry, April Twilights, and novels and stories—herself as a Shropshire Lad. But what do we mean when we say that a writer is "essential"? What makes a writer "essential"? What criteria do we use to form an answer? If we can honestly answer this question, then we will have truly understood what "essence" means. It is not an easy task, and it is probably best left to Willa Cather herself.
